ONE OF SPAIN'S PROBLEMS.

One of the curious consequences of the social revolution which is going on steadily, albeit still very much below the surface, in Spain, is the increasing difficulty experienced by the upper classes in deciding on a profession for their sons. In the old days there was never any doubt about the matter. These sons were all destined to "serve the state" directly in some capacity. The most favored capacity was, of course, the army, until the number of officers in the Spanish army, in proportion to the number of the upper classes, had become almost a by-word. But if it was not the army, then it was the civil service; and if neither of these two were possible, then it could only be one or the other of the liberal professions, the most popular being that of the lawyer.
The practice is still being continued, but difficulties in the way of achievement steadily accumulated, as first one department of state and then another is "modernized." Thus, as was pointed out in a recent article on the subject at the Segovia Military academy, a short time ago, no fewer than 859 boys presented themselves for the examination for 25 places, while at the school of infantry there were more than 2000 competitors for 300 places. The universities are turning out a constant stream of lawyers, far more, in fact, than can ever get cases, while the competitive examinations for the civil service have done away with the "influence of ministers," which at one time counted for much.
In these circumstances certain Spanish parents are beginning to be filled with serious misgivings. The fact of the matter is, however, that Spain is only going through what several other countries have gone and are still going through, as they work toward a realization of the fact that all useful labor is honorable labor, and that it is as impossible as it is absurd to make any distinctions in the matter of dignity. Senior Luis Araujo-Costa summed up the situation accurately enough when he said that in other countries, where industry and commerce were more developed than in Spain, young men were admitted to occupations thrown open by the great industrial houses to those who were qualified "by intelligence, honesty and industry," and that in Spain this door was almost closed.
As Spain develops commercially and industrially, however, a great change, it is tolerably safe to predict, will come over popular thought on the question of labor, and many barriers will be broken down and swept away which at the present time interpose themselves between the son of the grandee and a useful and honorable calling.—New York Times.

In 1909 of the 47,231 employees in the cotton industry in North Carolina over 18 per cent were under 16 years of age.
